Summer School on Developments in Economic Growth Analysis

May 18th – May 30th , 2009

“Human Capital and Economic Growth”

The past decade has witnessed an explosion of interest in the determinants of long-term economic growth by academic researchers and policy makers alike. Following on earlier path breaking work, some of this generation's most prominent economists have tackled this topic producing a bounty of academic articles and a number of notable books. These books share a comprehensive treatment of all aspects of economic growth. Though excellent in many ways, they can provide only a general overview of each aspect of growth but not an in depth treatment of individual aspects of long run economic growth. The role of human capital accumulation in economic growth is in the forefront of those topics needing a more exhaustive and specialized treatment. The popularity and importance of this subject is witnessed, at academic level, by the increasing number of articles on it appearing in leading journals and, at policy level, by the frequent exhortations by public officials on the importance of human capital formation in fostering growth. The Summer School “Human Capital and Economic Growth” of the Faculty of Economics Rimini and RCEA will combine a thorough review of the literature (both theoretical and empirical) along with state-of-the-art econometric analysis of the issues on the role of human capital in economic growth.
